Joyce, still in his early twenties when he wrote Dubliners, clearly drew on his own personal experiences more directly in writing these three tales. The namelessness of all three boys also encourages interpreters to identify them with Joyce, although from an interpretive point of view this move does little to illuminate the stories.

Dubliners Araby Summary and Analysis | GradeSaver
Araby by James Joyce. North Richmond Street, being blind, was a quiet street except at the hour when the Christian Brothers' School set the boys free. An uninhabited house of two storeys stood at the blind end, detached from its neighbours in a square ground. The other houses of the street, conscious of decent lives within them, gazed at one another with brown imperturbable faces.

The eyes of Joyce's readers burn, too, as they read this. One final point: Though all are written from the first-person point-of-view, or perspective, in none of the first three stories in Dubliners is the young protagonist himself telling the story, exactly. It is instead the grown-up version of each boy who recounts "The Sisters," "An Encounter," and "Araby."

James Joyce's Dubliners is a collection of short stories that aims to portray middle class life in Dublin, Ireland in the early twentieth century. Most of the stories are written with themes such as entrapment, paralysis, and epiphany, which are central to the flow of the collection of stories as a whole.

Epiphany And Paralysis In Araby By James Joyce - 1595 ...
In "The Sisters," "An Encounter," and "Araby," James Joyce offers the reader a first glimpse into the demoralizing world of Dublin and Dubliners. At the same time, he offers hope, in the form of his three unnamed protagonists. His own hope, perhaps, was that the reader would remember these boys during later, darker Dubliners encounters.
